Biographical/Historical note

The Employment Act of 1946 (Public Law 79-304) reflected both the lingering wounds of the Great Depression and the confident aspirations of the immediate postwar era. Section 2 declared it to be "the continuing policy and responsibility of the Federal Government to use all practicable means . . . for the purpose of creating and maintaining . . . conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment opportunities . . . for those able, willing, and seeking to work, and to promote maximum employment, production, and purchasing power." To achieve this policy, section 3 required the President to send Congress an annual report reviewing the economic program of the Federal Government and current conditions in the Nation, and outlining a program for implementing the policy proclaimed in section 2.

Section 5 of the act established the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, now known as the Joint Economic Committee. The committee's functions were outlined in the Employment Act and included studying the economic report, exploring means of coordinating programs to further the government's policy regarding employment, and providing guidance to congressional committees on the economic report. In short, the mandate enabled the committee to consider and make recommendations on the whole range of economic policy. Over the years, the committee provided facts and analyses to Congress on developing economic trends, offered advice regarding the mix of public and private policies most likely to achieve full employment, and issued annual reports to assist committees in dealing with legislation relating to the President's economic report.

Scope and Contents note

The records of the Joint Economic Committee include correspondence among committee members and staff, with other Members of Congress, and with interested citizens. For the years 1965 to 1968, there is a chronological file of outgoing letters, staff reports, and press releases. Other records of the committee include memoranda and speeches of committee members and staff, and information on committee activities. There are assorted materials relating to the February 1966 symposium held to honor the 20th anniversary of the Employment Act of 1946, as well as correspondence, memoranda, magazines, statements, charts, and press releases concerning the annual report of 1967.
